Aufhören. Können / Enabling Endings

As part of the ifk's focus on »The Last Things Before the Last,« the conference will address the difficulties and joys of quitting. In 1989, Hans Magnus Enzensberger hoped for more recognition for »heroes of retreat,« whom he saw embodied in figures such as Mikhail Gorbachev. The current political personnel, however, often cultivates male decisionism and sitting things out instead of a well-timed exit. In other areas of society, too, it is difficult to simply stop: for example, to end a carbon-based, extractive form of energy production. Although there is no shortage of scientific evidence that if we simply continue with our way of life, many systems will collapse, renunciation and abstinence for the sake of avoiding collapse are unpopular in many places. It therefore seems timely to take a closer look at the cultivation of practices of ending things in the horizon of Anthropocene – historical trajectories, archives and repertoires of knowledge, technologies of the self, and the interdependencies between theoretical considerations and every-day life will be discussed. What do practices of quitting look like, on a larger and smaller scale? What does it take to learn and practice them—and, in turn, to unlearn others? Last but not least, ending is not only a civilizational technique, but sometimes also an art.
